What's New in the Adobe Photoshop CS3?

Q: Make a shareable Live ImageView? I have a bunch of images and want to put them in an imageView that I can use across my app (in other activities). I currently have this code for inflating the images into the ImageView. public void addProjectImage(View v, String name, String file){ Bundle bundle = new Bundle(); bundle.putString("name", name); bundle.putString("file", file); Intent i = new Intent(ProjectActivity.this, ShareActivity.class); i.putExtras(bundle); startActivity(i); } And this is how I'm currently inflating the imageview. Bundle bundle = getIntent().getExtras(); name = bundle.getString("name"); file = bundle.getString("file"); ImageView img = (ImageView) findViewById(R.id.project_image); img.setImageBitmap(BitmapFactory.decodeFile(file)); I want to be able to use these images in other activities and not be tied to the app with the ImageView. I know I can just hardcode in the url, and I thought about making a shareable url for each image and calling that url in the XML, but that seems like a bad way to handle this problem. I'd like to avoid using a database for this too. I figured I could keep track of the urls and dynamically call them every time I need to use the image, but is there a better way? I'm sure someone knows a better way to handle this. I'm open to all suggestions. A: Rather than making it a broadcast receiver, I'd like to suggest that you call the method that is used to show the image directly from the activity that is creating the image. This will keep the project image management separate from the activity that is displaying the image and will require less code on your side. e.g., feeding behaviors, growth, and behavior disorders), do not allow identification of the mechanisms underlying changes in the feeding behaviors of pigs. Therefore, our results cannot be directly extrapolated to other species (i.e., ruminants or monogastric animals) and will need to be confirmed with other species. In conclusion
