SKIDROWN Novel primate retrovirus from Japanese macaques (Macaca fuscata) on the Japanese islands of Honshu and Kyushu: preliminary characterization and genetic diversity.

A novel endogenous retrovirus, designated HMSV, was found in the Japanese monkey Macaca fuscata in the Japanese islands of Honshu and Kyushu. The integration of the provirus in the host genome was detected in 16 of 46 (34%) fecal samples. The provirus was not detected in 536 strains of 7 primate species in Japan, including M. fuscata in Kyoto, located between Honshu and Kyushu. This suggests that the Japanese macaques are the possible source of the virus. No significant differences were observed in the host genomic polymorphisms between M. fuscata from Honshu and from Kyushu, indicating that the novel viral strain infecting these macaques was not genetically differentiated. The genome was 7022 nucleotides in length. The primary structure of a GAG region encoding the capsid protein of the virus was quite similar to that of foamy virus. Although the host-virus relatedness was determined by molecular analysis, the relationship between the Japanese macaques and foamy virus was not clarified. The gypsy retrovirus of M. fuscata may be involved in the evolution and diversity of the primate genus Macaca./*=====

[Crack.The entire 2 DVD pack includes all 7 hunt types and new tigers. In addition to that, there's the classic "If it bleeds it leads" mentality that nearly every other newspaper in the country uses to justify their coverage of the Brexit debate. But is the "If it bleeds" argument justified? Let's take a look.

First, let's look at the UK and EU press coverage of the recent recall of Parliament. While the Daily Telegraph and Daily Mail, both of which are pro-Brexit publications, felt the votes against Brexit were racist and aimed at “refusing to accept the will of the British public,” the Financial Times, Independent, Guardian, Telegraph, Mirror and Sun all believed “that it was not an abuse of process” and that “unacceptable attitudes were indeed at work in the chamber.” What the papers were really saying was that by opposing Brexit, anti-Brexit MPs were racist and anti-British. But can we really blame newspapers for seeing it that way? The recall of Parliament was the worst upset to hit British politics for decades. Parliament was split down the middle, with 48 percent voting against the withdrawal agreement and 50 percent in favour. In addition, Leave voters were split by two-to-one in favour of Theresa May's deal and Remain voters were split almost 3-to-1 against the deal. An upset of this magnitude normally results in a recall of Parliament. Yet, this was the only way that MPs could prevent Brexit taking place unless 2/3rds of MPs voted for a no confidence vote. And that means that anything other than a no confidence vote wouldn't have stopped Brexit. The fact that the only way to prevent Brexit taking place is with the addition of anti-Brexit MPs on a conscience vote also indicates that MPs opposed to Brexit are doing so on the basis of conscience rather than political opinion polls that led to widespread predictions of doom 3e33713323
