Which is especially true when you consider how much effort these apps require. As a small business owner you certainly don't have time or resources to generate these apps. On the other hand, there are a ton of apps available for free (or a very small fee). Consider Which Apps to Build The first thing you'll need to do is to consider which apps you want to build for your business and how you want to generate and receive revenue. Perhaps the first step is to use Appzapper to figure out if an iPhone app or Android App is right for you. It also helps to review the data on which apps are in the top 10,000 apps as ranked by the App Store and Google Play. Make a decision on whether you want to write the app yourself or hire a developer. Since most apps are built using either Objective-C or Java, it's a fair assumption that you need to know either or both, which is easier to learn. Even if you don't want to hire a developer, we have an API built specifically for helping bloggers make money. Identify the Right Platform Once you have a good idea of which platform and service you want to use, you'll need to choose a data storage service. If you have a database administrator, they probably already have a recommended service they recommend. If not, we have many to choose from. Make sure you're evaluating different services based on how fast they are, how easy it is to get data into them, and how easy it is to get data out of them. These services vary in price, which can be a big factor. If you're able to access your data from anywhere you should look at Amazon Web Services. Here are our rates. eBody is an easy to use diet planner that helps you determine the number of calories that need to be burned in a user-defined period of time. Although it may seem a very advanced program at the first sight, it's not, as eBody remains just a basic software solution relying on a great amount of information provided by the user. In fact, the only thing eBody does is to calculate the number of calories, protein, carbs and fat to be burned in a pre-configured period, all based on some user defined parameters. First of all, the application prompts the user to input his height, weight, age and gender. Plus, he or she needs to define the number of kilos to be lost in a specific number of days. User's mission doesn't stop here, as he/she needs to continue the task of providing information by inputting the type of exercises to be performed, the time in hours and the number of such activities every week. eBody supports a long list of exercises, including swimming, golf and football. Once you provide all these details, eBody calculates the number of calories, protein, carbs and fat to be burned and nothing more. No diet and no nutrition program, just this very basic information. The program works instantly and doesn't affect system performance at all, running fine on all Windows versions. All things considered, eBody is more like a waste of time and there are lots of similar apps on the market doing the same thing and a lot more.
