This effect was decreased after breast cancer cells were plated and grown for four hours in EGM2. A significant decrease was only observed in 1% MPP, reaching a level at which also the number of tubule structures was decreased. To further evaluate the effect of 1% MPP, we performed siRNA-mediated RNAi on HUVECs. Treatment with increasing concentrations of siRNA to NLRP3 led to a significant downregulation of NLRP3 expression, although NLRP3 siRNA was not completely effective, and there was a transient reduction of NLRP3 expression in the knockdown cells. Only at a relatively high concentration (20 nM) we observed a significant reduction in NLRP3 expression and a significant decrease in caspase-1 expression. In HUVECs, addition of 1% MPP at short time-points of exposure (up to four hours) had a transient effect on IL-1 β production and reduced angiogenesis as measured by the tube formation assay. Our data indicate that MPP treatment up to two hours before plating of the HUVEC did not have a significant effect, but that longer times of exposure may lead to an inhibitory effect. Nevertheless, we cannot rule out a potential feedback loop in which apoptosis-induced-IL-1 β production by glial cells leads to increased IL-1 β -mediated inflammation. After four hours of siRNA-mediated NLRP3 knockdown, cytokine production was significantly reduced in comparison to non-transfected HUVECs. Lymphatic metastasis of breast cancer is a well-established prognostic marker associated with poor patient outcome \[@pone.0217046.ref037]. Lymphatic metastasis occurs at the earliest stages of breast cancer development and is established by the localization of tumor cells in the lymphatic vessels \[@pone.0217046.ref038]. Several factors that contribute to the development and progression of breast cancer have been identified, including the increased expression of VEGF-C and V 3e33713323
