Furthermore, the software includes the ability to search music by albums or artists, and also has a built-in database containing popular songs that is updated on a weekly basis. The program supports a number of tags and flags, along with the possibility to store any details on an item. He who controls the audio input controls the monitoring environment. Without an amplifier, there is no monitoring environment. The result is that the beginning of a recording session can be more of a pain than an elixir. Most computer plug-ins have some controls which manage volume, de-emphasis, and balance between the front end and the back end and sometimes allow the user to affect the frequency response. Here are some of the most useful: Main volume control The main volume control is a slider which allows the user to affect the volume level in the studio environment. Most controllers also provide a knob for separate volume and a knob for level control. There is usually a separate switch for high pass and low pass and a detent so that the setting remains constant. The detent slider, however, is usually broken, not linear. It goes from very bright to silent, with a sharp set point, such as -20 dB. Decibel Level Meter Another useful tool is a sound level meter which indicates the level in decibels. Some controllers have an on-screen meter that does exactly this, or a built-in meter. If the stereo output jacks are preamplified, they should have a negative meter. Some meters are better than others, but all are useful for getting a measure of the signal level. De-emphasizer and Adaptive De-emphasis De-emphasis is a tool to place a virtual filter on the microphones
