cool specific or small regions with extreme accuracy. For example, in the field of semiconductor manufacturing, there is a desire to control the temperature of individual semiconductor substrates with an accuracy of 10^{-2} degree.C. The processing of a single substrate normally takes a few seconds and requires the application of a thermal energy input of about 50 W. The current state of the art for such technology is to use a hot or cold plate in conjunction with a thermally isolated mounting. This type of system is illustrated in FIG. 1, where the cold plate is indicated by reference numeral 1. In this device, the substrate 2 to be heated or cooled rests on the cold plate 1, which is capable of being moved. This movement is achieved by means of the mechanical adjustment of the vertical displacement 3 of the cold plate 1. On its side facing the substrate 2, the cold plate 1 can be provided with a sheet of insulation 4, which is maintained at constant temperature by means of a thermal element 5 (
