Play hours of the game have been extended to reach a much more satisfying pace.

Bile and bile salt binding proteins in rat liver. Bile and bile salts are known to modulate the activity of many hepatic enzymes. We studied the binding of two synthetic bile salts and a rat bile homogenate, using human serum albumin as a model ligand, to ascertain the binding characteristics of bile salts in the bile-exocrine pathway and their role in the enterohepatic circulation. Bile salts and bile enhanced significantly the binding of human serum albumin in a dose-dependent manner. The binding process involved a saturable component ($K_d = 0.62$ mM for sodium taurodeoxycholate and 0.25 mM for sodium glycocholate) and an unsaturable one. The binding of human serum albumin to bile salts was inhibited by increasing sodium chloride concentrations in the medium, suggesting that albumin binds to an anionically modified site in the bile salts. Homogenates obtained from rat livers also bind homologous bile salts and the binding is inhibited by anionically modified bile salt. Thus, the bile salt-albumin binding is a general property of liver cells.
