Evolutionary graph of the Culex pipiens complex based on mitochondrial and nuclear markers [pdf] The distribution of Culex pipiens in Africa was examined by molecular markers. Overall, there was a high genetic diversity of Culex pipiens in sub-Saharan Africa, particularly in West Africa. However, there was substantial genetic differentiation between Cx. pipiens and Cx. quinquefasciatus in West Africa. In addition, the high genetic diversity of Cx. pipiens in West Africa was not associated with Cx. quinquefasciatus, whereas Cx. quinquefasciatus had high genetic diversity in East Africa and West Africa. This study reveals that Cx. pipiens has the ability to adapt to local environmental changes. The distribution of Culex pipiens in Asia was examined by molecular markers. Overall, there was little genetic diversity of Cx. pipiens in Asia, despite significant genetic diversity of Cx. quinquefasciatus in Asia. The study of molecular markers reveals an evolutionary cline in Cx. pipiens in Japan from the Wada district in Kyushu prefecture to the Uruma district in Okinawa prefecture, and a genetic boundary in the region. Cx. pipiens can adapt to a humid climate. However, Cx. pipiens in Japan has low genetic diversity and has not evolved to adapt to a dry climate. The study of mitochondrial markers reveals significant genetic differentiation between Cx. pipiens and Cx. quinquefasciatus in Japan, despite the absence of significant genetic differentiation between other species in Asia. The distribution of Culex pipiens in South America was examined by molecular markers. Overall, there was a high genetic diversity of Cx. pipiens in South America, particularly in the Amazon Basin, which is the largest area of Cx. pipiens in South America. The study of molecular markers reveals that Cx. pipiens is genetically distinct in South America from both Cx. quinquefasciatus
