You can annotate your own movies and TV shows, find movies and TV shows to annotate, and create your own TV shows. Shows Why do we love to watch movies and TV shows? On any given day, at any given location, we can find ourselves drawn toward a movie, a TV show, a book, a painting, a song, a piece of music, or a drawing. We seem to feel an urge to grab some mental good-natured time with the image on the screen. What's happening? Our brains are wired for immersion. We are wired to watch and, in particular, to watch and listen to other people's stories. We want to wonder together. We want to celebrate together. We want to savor a shared mindscape. There are very few things more reassuring in the face of a grief or loss than a good story. There is nothing so universal, and so human, as story—a compelling yarn can satisfy anyone, anywhere, anytime. Call it primal or instinctive, a need to watch and listen is something we all share, and something that we never outgrow. It's a byproduct of being humans. And from that byproduct the storyteller's tools have been born.

Addition As tools, story-telling has changed little over time. As storytelling has changed over time, so have our media and the media's delivery systems: print, radio, radio, film and television. These days, in the 21st century, people are doing most of their watching and listening through the Internet. Television and film are becoming platforms for streaming video instead of being physical media. And as the Internet has become pervasive, the form of the stories we watch has followed suit. We no longer watch or listen to them. We interact. Hybrid design and metrology of an optical feedback wavelength division multiplexer on silicon for coherent all-optical communications.
