* _How to work with layers_ * _How to edit in the image editor_ * _Compositing images_ * _Creating 3-D effects_ You can use Photoshop to create a rich set of effects, including basic adjustments like contrast, brightness, and color balance, and more advanced options such as masking, special effects, and making fireworks from images. Chapter 9 introduces you to all the different layers in Photoshop, what they are, and how you can make use of them. ## JPEGs, RAW Files, and TIFFs JPEG is a compression method that works by converting the image from RGB to YCbCr. The process results in a smaller file, which is a good thing if you're managing a high-resolution image on your computer. However, the downsides are that JPEG compression can cause artifacts and blurring, and the file needs to be reloaded if you're working on it offline. TIFF is a file format originally designed for printing, so it requires that your image be in CMYK. TIFF is much larger than JPEG, so use it only if you need a more universal file that can be opened up in a variety of applications. ## Saving Files with the Right Settings After you've changed your image, you should save it and try to capture it at your final settings. You should also make sure that you're prepared to send the file over a network or submit it to a server and save it there. (If you have access to a brand new MAC, I recommend that you use Image Capture when you edit your image. See Book II Chapter 1 to learn more about editing with this program.) Follow these steps to save your image: 1. **Make all the adjustments in the photo to get the settings that you want.** If you create adjustments, click OK to make your changes or Cancel to keep the original image. 2. **Choose File** ⇒ **Save As.** 3. **Select your topmost image, which is the layer with the adjustments you made, and then select Save for Web or Save for Web and Devices.** After you've made your adjustments, the Save dialog box, shown in Figure 9-1, opens. 4. **In the Format box, select the File Format option, and then select JPEG from the list.** You don't want

Q: Default Material Icons causing overflow in Angular Component I'm using Angular's Material Icons in a component and for some reason, whenever I set the default appearance to 'outline-none' (which I assume is the default for Material Icons), the component becomes overflow: hidden and you can't see the whole component. See screenshot below: I'm not using the Material Icons though, I'm just using the CSS classes and the Font Awesome icon classes. Is there something else that I'm missing? This example I was using is not the problem as it works fine using any other type of icon. A: You need to add the icon classes. To use them, you need to add hello world to your html file. Example below: hello world

Bacterial biofilms are the primary cause of chronic infections in humans and industrial water systems. These biofilms are a complex matrix of extracellular polymeric substances secreted by bacteria. This matrix encases the bacteria within a self-produced protective environment that protects the bacteria from the host's immune system and from antibiotics and chemicals which are required to kill the bacteria. Bacterial biofilms, especially those associated with chronic and end stage diseases or infections, are notoriously difficult to treat. This is true for infections in the human body as well as the industrial process environment. The most notable example of this problem is the lack of success in treating chronic dental infections associated with dental caries, periodontal disease, treatment of recurrent infections of the joints and bones, indwelling medical catheters, pacemakers, and the like. Recent research has found that biofilm-specific bacteria have a greater tolerance for antibiotics and chemicals than non-biofilm forming bacteria. Consequently, the problem of biocorrosion is also intensified. A common example of biocorrosion is the corroding of the interior walls of pipes and pumps, which results in industrial waste and drinking water contamination. It is estimated that biocorrosion is responsible for $7 billion in repair and replacement costs worldwide each year. When biocorrosion begins, bacteria of similar type, e.g., Pseudomonas or Enterococcus bacteria, usually colonize the surface of the pipes or substrates. This type of bacterial colonization leads to the formation of a biofilm which makes it difficult to remove the bacteria, as the bacteria are enclosed in a matrix of extracellular polymeric substances that is relatively difficult to breakdown. In addition, the biofilm matrix is physically strong and may reduce the effectiveness of the treatments. The matrix formation process, in addition to reducing the effectiveness of the treatment, also makes it difficult to control the type of bacteria that form biofilms. Treatment methods that are intended to target only one type of bacteria may miss the formation of the biofilm, which could allow other types of bacteria to colonize the pipe, potentially causing a secondary infection. In addition to bacterial biofilms, there are fungal biofilms that are generally created by the germination of spores, which causes considerable problems for the human body as well as industrial process environments. The biofilms formed by fungi may also interfere with the effectiveness of the treatments. There are many different surface treatments that
