It is one of those quintessential PC games you love, that you just can't beat. It has the bright colours, the great music and graphics, and the in-your-face attitude. The amount of time Naboo spent on this game says a lot about their design philosophy. Despite the fact that Naboo is a company that specialises in very colourful, rather abstract, futuristic games, Naboo has actually taken the time and effort to create a 3D racing game that is visually very realistic. Gameplay isn't too shabby either, with a wide selection of cars (19 in fact) and racing circuits to test them against. The controls are standard, three buttons for acceleration, brakes and steering (which works just about as you would expect). The AI is programmed to race hard, and will occasionally lie into an opponent, something that can be a little frustrating. The engine is fairly realistic for what it is; it doesn't make unrealistic power as you would expect a futuristic racing game to do. This brings us to the probably one of the only serious flaws in Naboo's game. The multiplayer option. Don't get Lolia LUsAKovarkov Any advice?Principal Curve A curve in a space X is principal if it is the graph of an equation of the form $f(x,y) = 0$ where f is a bivariate continuous function. The 1-parameter family of curves generated by a principal curve form a curve complex. The curve complex is closely related to the tessellation cell complex. Curves. Curve Complex. Category:Curves Category:Geometric optimizationQ: How to efficiently check if any string contains a substring The problem I'm facing is: Given a string, find the number of strings that contain a certain substring in the first or last position. You are allowed to assume that the string contains only lowercase letters. Example: str1 = "abcdef" str2 = "bcdabc" str3 = "abcdabc" The answer is: 2 for str1 and str2 because "def" and "abc" are substrings of str1 and str2 respectively. However, for str3 the answer is 1 because there is not substring other than the substrings at the first and last positions. What I have done so far is as follows: 1) Split the string into an array using str.split() and get the length of the resulting array. 2) For each of the substrings, check if the array element at the first or the last position is equal to the substring. It seems inefficient to me. Is there a better way to do the same thing? A: How about splitting the string into a StringBuilder, inserting it, then determining the number of matches in the resulting StringBuilder? Something like: String str = "abcdef"; StringBuilder a = new StringBuilder(); for (int i = 0; i
