Kontakt 5 Library Twitter is a CRM - gorogoa Twitter's fundamental function is simple: allow people to send short, 140-character messages to each other. It's an amazing product that is taken for granted and yet I can't find a way to get my sales team and my leads to start using it. Anyone have any strategies for getting sales people and leads using Twitter? ===== Udo Have you considered using Twitter's API to send out Tweets? You might even be able to integrate that into your current client, if you're using one of those lightweight clients. I haven't used Twitter's API in the past but would assume it would be very easy and cheap. Twitter is a powerful tool, don't underestimate it. I admit I have a soft spot for it because it helped me get my first company (TheLemonade.com) off the ground. I went through a phase where I was so obsessed with it that I wasted a lot of time and money on it. If your company has a product you can use in a different way, consider making a Twitter app or blog or just about anything you can think of. This is not at all a mistake. Twitter users are a community and a community will always be willing to help each other out, provide links to useful information and generally give advice. The only thing you have to do is to earn the trust of your potential community by being yourself and by putting quality content and links on your website. ----- bioweeek I'm just starting to use it myself and can't recommend it to anyone. Some of it is the twitter's fault, but it's also the fact that my sales people on focus groups actually hate to use Twitter for anything other than something totally crazy like "buy our book". I'm starting to think of interesting things to say to customers, but I'd be lost if I had to explain all the Twitter lingo to new people. ----- gpc You can integrate with twitter to tweet from your site or even via rss. See

This invention relates to lighting fixtures and, more particularly, to an improved remote fluorescent lighting fixture having a substantially continuous spiral shaped reflector. Standard fluorescent lighting fixtures are typically provided in a standard E-12 configuration having a lamp socket at one end and a reflector extending from the opposite end. The reflector provides a continuous reflector surface of the opposite end of the E-12 configuration. When such a fixture is mounted at a location which does not allow the conventional minimum spacing of the end portion of the reflector adjacent to the end of the E-12 configuration, it is necessary to either move the end of the reflector which extends from the opposite end of the E-12 configuration farther away from the E-12 configuration than a minimum spacing distance or to move the fixture itself to the side of a typical E-12 configuration so that the reflector end portion can extend further from the opposite end of the E-12 configuration. While either of the options is acceptable, the former option is preferred since it requires a minimum amount of adjustment, while the latter option requires a substantial amount of space to provide the desired minimum spacing. The latter option makes the lighting fixture less desirable since it is designed to be located in close proximity to other lighting fixtures. A need has therefore existed for a fluorescent lighting fixture which provides the desired reflector end portion length of a standard E-12 configuration without requiring a greater distance between the opposite end of the E-12 configuration and the reflector end portion than what is required by the minimum spacing, yet which is located in a standard E-12 configuration for ready mating with other E-12 configuration lighting fixtures.

Konrad von Finckenstein
Konrad of Finckenstein () (born before 1270; died 7

February 1330), was a member of the House of Mecklenburg. He was the second son of Hans of Finckenstein. After the death of his older brother Reinhard in 1292, he became the heir apparent to the Princely House of Mecklenburg-Güstrow. He was captured and spent eight years in captivity in the service of the Teutonic Knights in Prussia. Konrad later returned to his
