coatings are applied on steel substrates for protection against corrosion in many industries.
Coatings can be applied to steel in one or more steps. First, the steel is typically cleaned and degreased, as by scrubbing, and then dried. The steel is then primed, or coated with a basecoat. Usually, the basecoat is applied first and then a pigmented topcoat is applied over the basecoat. The pigmented topcoat is commonly referred to as a “clearcoat.” Depending on the type of protection desired, the steel substrate may be protected by a single coating or a combination of coatings, for example, one layer or two or more basecoats and pigmented topcoats. In the oilfield industry, where chemical-laden water can be introduced into the well, surface protection of equipment used in the well and protection of pipelines that bring the fluids to the surface from the well are critical to safe and efficient operation of the oilfield. In order to protect the pipelines, they are coated with corrosion protection coatings. Oilfield pipelines are subjected to a variety of corrosive fluids, which may attack the pipelines and their coatings. These corrosive fluids can include acids, such as hydrochloric, hydrofluoric, and other hydrohalide acids. In addition, pipeline coating formulations and the pipelines themselves are frequently exposed to other acids and other harsh environments. Such acids and environments can cause corrosion of pipeline surfaces and of the pipeline coating, which can result in the need for costly replacement of the pipeline. Additionally, in some oilfield pipelines, maintenance can be difficult, due to extreme temperatures. In extreme temperatures, pipelines can expand and contract as the surrounding temperatures increase or decrease, which may stretch, or even crack, pipeline coatings. To provide long term protection, it is desirable to apply corrosion protection coatings that provide an effective corrosion protection for the full life of the pipeline, yet remain flexible and do not crack and become brittle.
