Lightroom 5 is a nice touch app to have, but not one I'd necessarily choose for every job. However, it is a really nice thing to have for personal projects that you don't want to share. I'm not sure how long it will remain a beta release, but I hope it does linger a while. For now, the range of tools is still very impressive, and there are certain features that make it a better choice for photographers with larger projects. That said, there are plenty of features I'd like to see added such as versioning, previews, and an Automator-like workflow. Lightroom would also be a lot more useful if it could use multiple external drives on the fly as tools to import, export, and back up importable files. Of course, that's just wishful thinking. Deep image editing is great, but it isn't going to replace Photoshop when it comes to retouching. Still, there are other things to love about this release. For instance the Vibrancy feature that makes text and objects look more alive. It's a welcome addition. Lightroom 5's Layer Panel also makes it easy to add and cancel custom Layers with comments and changes. In my opinion, that's one thing that's getting a little bit too powerful. I for one have found myself using this tool as a way to exclude layer from undo when making changes. I'm sure this is going to be used for more. In my own workflow, I'm finding it hard to use Layer Panel for what was intended for use as Layers.
