I use Photoshop Elements as a basic photo manipulation tool. In fact, I don't even use Photoshop Elements for anything more than the basic image manipulation it does well. (If, however, you need to 4K Animate your image, use Adobe Animate—it's far, far better than Photoshop's Animate as it offers 4K physics, sound, and much, much more.) As I said earlier, Photoshop is a great manipulator, and with Elements, I can do many of the basic tasks I would otherwise have to do in Photoshop: rotate, crop, make selections, resize, create new layers, add text, and much more. Leaving aside the fact that Photoshop, unlike Elements, also provides the significantly improved tools for batch handling files (particularly useful for certain tasks such as adding watermarks to images), Elements is an excellent way to get started using Photoshop. I still don't understand why their products are always so slow on computers that aren't super-fast. Lightroom opens up files instantly, but once I have it up, and am trying to find out when the files were opened, it's almost always 15+ minutes later. It freezes up for seconds at a time, and clearing it up can take upwards of 20 minutes. Lightroom 4 is just, well, slow.

Admittedly, with all the new features and updates to the program since version 4, it's actually a very good comparison to see Lightroom 5 and to try out the new features. I tried my best to accurately compare the two programs side-by-side. That's was the point. Comparing versions 4 and 5 of Lightroom is probably as good a way as any to showcase how great of an improvement Lightroom 5 is over Lightroom 4. Without further ado, here are my results. There are two that stand out in particular for me, and are worth highlighting: 5 Major
